Course Description

This course will provide the opportunity for critical inquiry into theories and principles related to health promotion in a global context. Students will be introduced to strategies that pertain to global health promotion of individuals, communities and nations and that affect both physical and social determinants of health. Examples of specific topics to be covered include the historical underpinning of global health, global health financing, infectious disease, food security, refugee health, sexual and reproductive health, and global health promotion in a humanitarian context. These topics will be explored using both international and local case studies that highlight the globalized reality in which contemporary health promotion practice is situated.

Prerequisite(s): Minimum of 60% in each of Health Sciences 1001A/B and 1002A/B

Course Objectives

To understand global health promotion and health issues

To comprehend the complexity of factors that shape the health of communities globally

To critically examine theoretical models and issues of equity and social justice within the context of global health promotion

To be able to identify major actors involved in global health and be aware of the context in which they operate beliefs, and health care practices

To share experiences and perspectives about global health

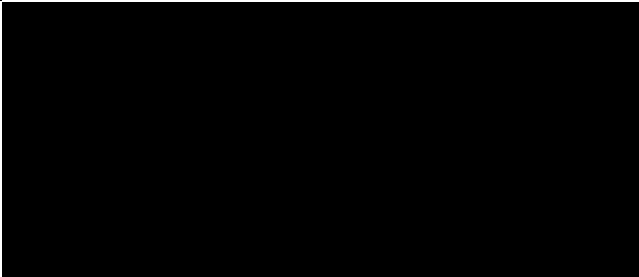

Course Structure

In this course, learning and teaching are considered a shared responsibility. My role is to guide, facilitate and support your learning. Your responsibility is to use the resources and to engage in dialogue and reflective, critical thought. The course is designed to foster discussion, debate, and critical examination of concepts relevant to global health promotion. The learning activities are designed to assist you in developing insight and to critically consider issues of global health promotion. Attendance in class and active participation in all activities is therefore expected. Tutorial sessions in this course and students will have opportunities to share thoughts and exchange ideas with others.
